What does it mean to be critical when thinking about international relations?

What are the implications of being critical about the ways in which we think global politics?

Is criticality an attitude of thinking without end?

This roundtable aims to explore ways in which we can think critically about power, order and governance. It will begin with a brief intervention by three panelists and the floor will then be open to discussion.

Everyone is welcome.

Workshops on Modes of Reasoning

Modes of Reasoning is a research theme of the Chair Group on History and Theory of International Relations. It aims to explore different dimensions of thought through which ideas such as power, governance, the global and the international have been approached, both historically and in current political practice.
